VEDIC VIEW OF LIFE

There have been, from the earliest times, two schools of thought, regarding man's outlook on life. There are those who believe in enjoying life to the full. For those people the only object in life is to eat, drink and be merry and their attitude towards life finds a very clear expression in the saying that man is rather a long-living animal with great powers of enjoyment, if he does not deliberately forego them. At the other extreme stand those men and women to whom the world in all emptiness, vanity and deceit. For these people material life has no charm. They believe it to be a source of positive misery and, therefore, escape from it is the essential step towards salvation.

The presence of pain cannot be denied. But we cannot subscribe to the view that the whole world is felling miserable. Had the world been entirely painful, nobody should have felt a liking for it. As a matter of fact, the world is not exclusively painful. It has both pleasure as well as pain and the former exceeds the latter. That is why everybody likes to continue here, however adverse the conditions may be under which he be placed. As a rule man always chooses pleasure and has no inclination for pain. The Veda, therefore adopts a realistic view of the world.

Looking more closely into the matter it will be seen that though there is some truth in both the views, they reveal only one side of the picture and, therefore, partial truth. The whole truth, according to the Veda consists neither in the denial of the world and its objects (created by God so that man may benefit from them) nor in their enjoyment by possession, but by enjoying in renunciation. The Vedic view is successful synthesis of the two extremes which may be summed up as enjoyment followed by renunciation. All civilisations in the past in general, our own civilisation in particular, have tried to evolve and materialise this idea in the forms of religious or social institutions.

Ashrania-dharma of the Vedic Aryans is a well-considered attempt in this direction. Any person practising this Dharma will desire no more than what he can get justly, use soberly, distribute cheerfully and leave contentedly. He will be careful in warming his hands before the fire without burning them.

The way to escape from misery is not to turn our back on the world, but to follow the divine law of right conduct, as advised by the Vedas.

The Vedic view is a practical synthesis of the two seemingly opposing theories. Of course, the enjoyment should be free and true enjoyment of the spirit, and not of the satisfaction of the sense based on the impact of the external world on the sensory organs. Similarly, renunciation also is not the rejection of the world with its objects but renunciation of worldly desires and ambitions. If a man had only acted in the light of the teachings of the Veda, he should have realised that the worldly goods, which he is trying to possess physically to a limitless extent, are not his. He can use them but cannot claim them as his own. If he had known that behind all material existence there is a universal spirit which permanently controls it, things would certainly have been different. But the most tragic part of it all is that man does not learn this lesson was from his own accumulated experience embodied in human history. If there is one lesson which is potent on the pages of the history of every nation, it is this that no individual, nor any nation, however powerful at one time, has even been successful in holding the world in its possession for all times. To me it appears that the only lesson which man has learnt from history is that man has learnt nothing from history.

Man may be a social animal but the last part of life road has to be walked in a single file.
